"This book is not intended as a popular treatise on the subject. It is primarily intended for the use of entomologists, medical men, health officers, and others interested in health questions. It contains descriptions of the structure and habits of the house-fly, its breeding habits, and the life-history and structure of the larvae. A chapter is given to the natural enemies and parasites of the house-fly, and other species of flies frequenting houses are described. The final chapters relate to the connection of house-flies with disease, and the control measures that are available for limiting the numbers of flies. . . . The book is exceedingly well illustrated, and full acknowledgment is made of the contributions of other workers in the same field. Dr Gordon Hewitt is to be congratulated on the production of a work of such high authority, which will be consulted by all those who are interested in this branch of science."—Journal of the Royal Sanitary Institute
