"De rerum natura"

1996. 23 x 15,5 cm. IX, 343 pages. Cloth DM 218,- / approx. £ 87.00
ISBN 3-11-015046-8

(Untersuchungen zur antiken Literatur und Geschichte, Vol. 48)

A study of pseudo-Lucretian elements in the didactic verse poem "De rerum natura" with its foundations of physics, psychology and theology by the Roman poet Lucretius (approx. 98-55 BC).

The author first develops valid criteria for identifying interpolations. Then, starting from numerous repetitions which have no equal in Latin literature, the study compiles all of the interpolated lines in Lucretius' text and finally develops a typology for the interpolations thus discovered and presents a new interpretation of the genuine text. Contains original Latin passages.

TRAGEDY AND ENLIGHTENMENT

Athenian Political Thought and the Dilemmas of Modernity

Christopher Rocco

"Reading Classical Greek texts in the light of Critical Theory and vice versa, Rocco's Tragedy and Enlightenment produces a dialectic of mutual illumination, cross-fertilizing two seemingly distinct traditions that still have much to offer the postmodern world."

FICTION AS HISTORY

Nero to Julian

G.W. Bowersock

New in paper—"The fascination and importance of this book arises above all from its own purpose, but its dazzling insights have special value as well to the world in which controversy rages over rewritings of history. . . . Fiction as history is a timely and, as this wonderful book makes clear, timeless topic."
