Special Issue: Geographies at Work in Asian History

The articles presented here grew out of a year-long discussion of the spatial dimensions of historical and cultural change in various parts of Asia during the early modern and modern periods. Each essay engages the ways in which geographies—here defined as visual and verbal discourses about space—perform political and cultural work. That is, we examine how geographies in Asia were deployed strategically, whether to map, narrate, frame, relocate, or dislocate particular places, regions, “homelands,” or nation-spaces. In recent centuries, these Asian geographies have necessarily coexisted with Western (principally European) geographies, whether in the colonial or postcolonial context. As these essays show, such coexistence has taken many forms, from conflict to emulation to apparent disinterest.

Although these essays do not adopt a single, unified methodological approach, they share common theoretical and practical concerns. Chief among these are a desire to subject geographical categories to critical scrutiny, a conviction that geography and spatiality are active and effective, rather than simply metaphorical terms, and a commitment to interdisciplinary and interarea study of the inhabitation, conceptualization, and representation of space in various Asian contexts.

This project began as a roundtable discussion at the 1999 AAS Annual Meeting, and continued at a workshop conference at the University of Colorado at Boulder in June of 1999. We would like to thank the Association for Asian Studies and The Journal of Asian Studies for providing the fora within which to explore our ideas. We also wish to acknowledge the University of Colorado’s Council on Research and Creative Work, Graduate Committee on the Arts and Humanities, and the Center for Asian Studies for funding the Boulder conference. In Boulder, a remarkable group of scholars provided comments and criticisms that contributed significantly to the essays presented here. On behalf of the six contributors to this special issue, we would like to thank Susan Blum, Carolyn Cartier, Michael Gibbs, Lionel Jensen, Patricia Nelson Limerick, Dennis McGilvray, Ruth Mostern, Nancy Park, Carl Pletsch, Rachel Silvey, and Timothy Weston.
