Acknowledgements

The list of those without whose help this book would have been poorer is much longer than I can acknowledge here. Special thanks are due, though, to many people who have put aside their own concerns to read and reread drafts of this book. Particularly helpful were comments on the text as a whole provided by Stéphane Audoin-Rouzeau, Joanna Bourke, Elisabeth Domansky, Hilary Gaskin, Diana Goodrich, Ira Katznelson, Ken Inglis, George Mosse, Emmanuel Sivan, Barry Supple, and Marie Wood.

For comments on specific points or areas of expertise beyond me, I am grateful for the help of: Susanna Barrow, Annette Becker, Barbara Bodenhorn, Jillian Davidson, Adrian Gregory, Caroline Humphrey, Samuel Hynes, Martin Jay, Alex King, Reinhard Kosseleck, Tom Laqueur, David Lloyd, Sarah O’Brien-Twohig, Antoine Prost, and Maria Tippett. A special note of gratitude goes to Fritz Stern, teacher and friend, with whom I have been fortunate enough to walk these paths for nearly three decades.

The assistance of librarians and archivists has been both rewarding and full of friendship. Marie Wood made the Australian War Memorial a home away from home, and Irina Rens drew me into the riches of the Bibliothek für Zeitgeschichte with kindness and sympathy. Cécile Coutin at the Bibliothèque de documentation internationale contemporaine (now at the Bibliothèque de l’Arsenal), Ilena Danielson at the Hoover Institution, and Nigel Steel at the Imperial War Museum went out of their way to be helpful. If there is a war between historians and archivists, I have been blissfully ignorant of it.

The company of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke College and colleagues in the Faculty of History has been a great support; they have been liberal in providing space for thought, tolerance for its expression, and an academic home for visiting scholars working in this field. Many of the final stages of writing this book took place in the splendid setting of the Villa Serbelloni at Bellagio, and in Canberra at the Australian National University. Hospitality is an art form; some of the finest practitioners of the art have helped me finish this book. Thanks are due to them all.

My students at Cambridge have helped me in ways most do not know. They patiently and critically listened to the ideas that grew in the course of writing this book, and threw cold water more than once on overheated and ill-considered interpretations. Periods as visiting professor at the University of California at Berkeley and at Yale University provided congenial communities for the discussion of the issues in this book. Over the years librarians at the Cambridge University Library and the Pembroke College Library have borne with my requests and queries with exemplary patience.

To my colleagues at the Historial de la grande guerre at Péronne, Somme, goes a more general acknowledgement. We have been lucky enough to create our own ‘site of memory’, and the effort, so rewarding in and of itself, also demonstrated what collective work and commitment can mean in historical scholarship. They will know in what ways this book could not have been written without them.

For permission to reproduce copyright material held in archives I am grateful to the Archives nationales, the Bibliothèque Nationale, the Archives départementales des Vosges, the British Library, Imagérie d’Epinal, the Royal Institute of British Architects, the Australian War Memorial, and the Mortlock Library of South Australia. For permission to cite from family papers deposited in the Imperial War Museum, I am grateful to Miss Joyce Badrocke (Wakeman papers); Mr David Lloyd (Lloyd papers); Mr Len Wade (Claydon papers), and to the Trustees of the Imperial War Museum. Richard Davis has agreed kindly to permit use of material originally published in the book he jointly edited with R.J. Helmstadter, Religion and irreligion in Victorian society (London, Routledge, 1992).
