DRY FARMING IN THE NORTHERN GREAT PLAINS 1900–1925

By MARY WILMA M. HARGREAVES

All who are interested in the history and farm economy of the semiarid West will be grateful for this detailed and well-documented analytical narrative of agricultural settlement in eastern Montana and the western Dakotas. Here is the Dry Farming Movement—as an effort at development, as a program of agricultural research, and as a factor in national, state and private land-use policies and programs. Here is the process of settlement itself—its volume, the areas it developed, the farming program it followed, its achievements, its costs, and its problems. Here are some of the consequences of a lack of overall planning in the public interest.
