

Finally we might note that Astyphilos' name, literally 'lover of the city', is a rather ironic one for someone who was absent as often as he was from Athens. But then, for all the time he spent away, it clearly mattered to him that his bones be returned home in the end, as they were, for burial and remembrance.

EDITORIAL NOTE

Since this is to be the last issue of Greece and Rome published by Oxford University Press, the current editors would like to express their warmest thanks and appreciation to those at the Press who have worked mostly closely with us in recent years, namely Eva Gooding, Clare Morton, and Peter Spooner, for their unstinting help, expertise, and support in the smooth production of the journal.

Katherine Clarke and Christopher Burnand

doi:10.1093/gromej/cxi034