by Bernd J. Fischer

The Second World War in Europe has generated more literature than perhaps any other event in modern history. While still a student Freud published his first research papers on neurology. These papers reflect his early scientific career which led him from his psychological research on eels to the river crayfish and its nervous system. It was a decidedly physicalistic-scientific concept of the world with which the young Freud was confronted by his teachers and which he readily accepted.

As a consequence of his neurological studies, Freud developed his earliest psychological theory. Although he soon rejected this scientific model which attempted to explain the psychical apparatus by means of the physiology of the brain, his scientific interest was henceforth determined by his search for the precise structure of the psyche.

It is the thesis of the authors that the concepts of psychoanalysis are based on the same scientific foundations that had determined Freud's early neuroscientific research and that he never really abandoned or modified this epistemological orientation in any decisive way even in his later work.

In the past, Austria was the center of a large multinational and multiethnic empire, the second-largest state in Europe and the heart of cultural development, particularly in music. At the turn of the last century, it gave birth to modern psychology, philosophy, economics, and music. In the contemporary world, Austria has played a key role between Eastern and Western Europe; serves as a model of a democratic society and a successful economy; participates fully in the new European Union and works with its old dominions and neighbors in East-Central Europe helping them in their renaissance. In also faces many of the problems of the modern period: ethnic antagonisms, questions of women’s and immigrants’ rights, and the possible loss of economic and political sovereignty in the new unified Europe. This series is drawn from many of these rich aspects of Austrian life and history.
