On John Wansborough
15 July 2007

To the Editor,

In your December 2006 issue [volume 40(2):197-199], Fred M. Donner’s interesting “retrospective review” of Patricia Crone and Michael Cook’s Hagarism (1977) gives no credit to the late John Wansbrough for doing at least as much as them to wake up “the then rather sleepy field of early Islamic studies,” with his enigmatic, even hermetic contributions Quranic Studies (1977) and The Sectarian Milieu (1978). In the same issue, Mohamad Nasrin misspells his name as ‘Warnsbrough’ in an informative but rather patronizing review of the recent reprint of Quranic Studies [pp. 250-251].

Has Wansbrough now become al-ab’ad, the absent one, whose name is not mentioned, or, if it is, admonishingly mangled? In any case, a thorough critical appraisal of this reputed incendiary among scholars is surely overdue.

Sincerely,
Jonathan Benthall

To the Editor,

Professor Jonathan Benthall’s letter rightly suggests that the late John Wansbrough, like the authors of Hagarism, offered revisionist ideas about early Islam that shook the traditional views of Islam’s origins to their foundations. I did not mention his work in my review simply because that review was of Hagarism, not of all relevant recent research on early Islam. It was not meant as a slight of Wansbrough or his contribution.

I would have to differ with Prof. Benthall, however, on the relative impact of Hagarism and of Wansbrough’s two books. As Prof. Benthall suggests, Wansbrough’s Quranic Studies and The Sectarian Milieu were written in exceedingly difficult prose (he himself calls them “hermetic”). I think that, by themselves, these books would have changed a significant segment of scholarly opinion only very slowly, for the simple reason that few readers would have had the fortitude to read and digest
