Beyond Brotherhood Week

To the Editors: Before commenting on Henry Siegman's informed and intelligent account of recent Roman Catholic documents on the Jews ("Jews and Christians—Beyond Brotherhood Week," Worldview, December, 1975), let me put in a plug for Notre Dame. In answer to Siegman's question whether the ideas provided by the Vatican Guidelines will be put to good use, Notre Dame recently appointed its first Jewish scholar with specific responsibility for Jewish history and thought after the beginning of Christianity and has established a center for the study of Judaism and Christianity. The university library is increasing its holdings in Hebrew books and is now purchasing the Makor series of manuscripts in facsimile editions and other early Jewish texts. The study of the Hebrew language (Biblical, Mishnaic, and modern) is being intensified. Whether any of this has to do with the Vatican Guidelines I doubt (our efforts began several years ago), but it does represent our intention to make the study of Judaism part of our regular offerings for undergraduates, graduate students, and future priests.

Mr. Siegman's discussion of the Vatican Guidelines, and the various Jewish criticisms of them, is judicious, eliminating questions due to misreading or misunderstanding and focusing on the chief issues, e.g., the land in Jewish piety and thought, the State of Israel, and theological questions posed by the relation of the two religions. In the theological discussion, however, he presents a view of Christianity and Judaism that, no matter how well intended and initially attractive, is not a realistic possibility for the Christian. He speaks of the "ultimate incommensurability of Judaism and Christianity" as the starting point for Jewish-Christian dialogue. The difficulty with this view, a difficulty that has plagued Christian-Jewish relations since the beginning, is that Christianity has not, indeed cannot, view Judaism simply as another religion such as Islam or Hinduism. As Siegman recognizes, Christianity has validated itself historically and theologically by reference to Judaism and the Hebrew Scriptures. The appeal to Judaism and the interpretation of Christianity in relation to the Jewish Bible is not an accidental development within Christian thought, but at the center of the Christian self-understanding. Parenthetically, the continuing use of the Hebrew Scriptures (the Christian Old Testament) in Christian worship, accenting in recent years by a new lectionary that includes a reading from the Hebrew Bible (alongside two readings from the New Testament) in the Liturgy, only serves to underline the situation.

If Sinai and Calvary were mutually exclusive, the history of Christian-Jewish relations would, I am certain, have taken a much different form. It is precisely because, over the whole of Western history there have continued to be believing, observant Jews, that Christianity has felt threatened and defensive in the face of Judaism. The continuing existence of Judaism is an implicit criticism of the Christian claims, a fact noted not only by Jews, but also by Greek critics of Christianity in antiquity such as Porphyry and Julian. In answer to its critics, Christianity caricatured Judaism as moribund, a charge that was patently false. But this view became part of the Christian tradition and has made it extraordinarily difficult for Christians to see Judaism for what it is and has become rather than what Christians thought it should be. A Judaism that is lifeless and legalistic (so the Christian caricature) or nonobservant is much easier to integrate into the Christian perspective than one that is dynamic, spiritual, observant, and biblical. Mr. Siegman is correct that the most hopeful aspect of the Vatican document is the recognition that Judaism is a rich and vital religion in its most hopeful aspect of the Vatican post-Christian period, but he does not appreciate that this statement, viewed theologically, not simply phenomenologically or historically, is profoundly troubling to the Christian mind.

But perhaps we can take a clue from another issue raised by his article, namely, Christian attitudes toward the establishment of the State of Israel. Classical Christian theology constructed its view of Judaism, at least in part, on the basis of the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple. These events were thought to be evidence that the Christian claims were true. In the fourth century, however, before Christianity had become the official religion of the Roman Empire, the Emperor Julian attempted to rebuild the temple and restore the city to the Jews. His efforts, even though aborted by his early death, terrified the Christians. If Julian had been successful, he would have ended the "captivity" (in the Christian view) of the Jews, which had begun in 70 C.E., a captivity that, according to the Christian reading of the prophets, was never to end. This captivity has now ended, and the fathers have been proven wrong, suggesting, incidentally, the fragility of any theology based too closely on historical events. Christian theology, though at times seemingly intractable to empirical evidence, will be forced into making the necessary adjustment in its thinking, for the earlier views were shaped in response to other events. And the same will, I am certain, be the case for Christian attitudes toward Judaism itself. Christians have never really known the Jews and their religion, but as they begin to know and appreciate Jewish tradition and history, they will, slowly to be sure, begin the process of adjusting their religious ideas to their new experiences and understanding. Up until very recently Christian theology has seen the existence of Judaism as visible evidence challenging the Christian claims about Jesus and God's presence in the world. It is, of course, too much to say in 1975, and the Jew can hardly be expected to take comfort from it, but there may come a day when Christians will see the existence of believing Jews and the continuation of Judaism as a sure sign of God's presence in the world. From the Christian perspective, then, the starting point of any Christian-Jewish dialogue cannot be the exclusivity of Christianity and Judaism, but their mutual dependence and their complementary testimony to God and his ways with the world.

To the Editors: Rabbi Henry Siegman's article on the Vatican Guidelines is a wise and irenic discussion, and he is to be complimented both for its occasional bluntness and its prevailing graciousness. As a Christian of Protestant persuasion, I do not feel called upon to agree or disagree with his positions on Nostra Aetate and the long-delayed Guidelines. But there are certain points where his observations reach to non-Christian Christianity and may justify comment.

First, I am not sure that there has been any comparable developments of similar import for Christian-Jewish relations during this entire decade in Protestant...Christianity. At one level there can never be similar developments on any subject—for Protestant churches do not have the Roman magisterium. At another, to the extent that basic change at judicatory level is accompanied by a changing mind in the congregations, the 1971 statement of the Synod of the Hervormde Kerk (Netherlands) and the 1975 declaration of the Rat der Evangelischen Kirche in Deutschland are as important as any Protestant developments can be.

Second, Rabbi Siegman's statement of the way Christianity and Judaism parted may be misleading. It may be a good way of expressing it to say that Christianity "chose the liberating experience of faith in Jesus over the stubborn evidence of unredeemed history"; it is certainly a generous way. But there was another article of belief, the Incarnation, that should have anchored Christianity in history, with all its ambiguities. Instead, Christians have oscillated between flight from history (Docetism) and equating the Second Person of the Trinity with the historical church (Triumphalism), both of which positions are heresies. The sharp questions for Christian self-examination run along this path: "Was Jesus a 'false Messiah'? If not, where are the signs of the millennial age?"

Related to this line of thought is "the failure of the Christian world to assimilate utterly the Jewish war by which Judaism constitutes a denial of the central Christian mystery and its notion of salvation..."), but must we assume that the parties will not change through genuine interaction? What then would be the point of initiating a process?

Affirming the Jewish right of self-definition, and insisting as a Christian that our traditional lies and malice vis-à-vis the Jewish people must undergo conversion, I would still affirm that the eschatological hope applies to Jews as well as Christians. We shall all be changed.
