Historically, there is abundant evidence that patients who abuse alcohol and drugs may have a higher rate of mortality compared to those who do not. This is particularly true in the emergency department setting. The treatment of these patients can be challenging and requires a multidisciplinary approach, including medical management, social work, and psychological support. This approach highlights how research and practice are intertwined, as understanding the epidemiology of substance abuse can guide clinical decision-making and treatment strategies.